A GRAND OLD POEM.

Who shall judge a man from manners?

Who shall know him by his dress?

Prayers as for nothing he dresses.

Crumpled shirt and dirty jacket.

He is the poorest of the poor.

There are springs of crystal water.

Ever welling out of stone.

Hidden, crushed, and overgrown.

God, who counts by souls, not dresses.

While he values riches, the highest.

But as pebbles in the sea.

Man upbraid above his fellow.

On forgets his fellow then.

That your meanness blinds are men.

Men by thought, and men by fame.

Claiming riches, the highest.

But as pebbles in the sea.

There are foam-battered oceans.

There are little weed clad hills.

There are feeble little streams.

There are cedars on the hills.

God, who counts by souls, not dresses.

Loves and prospers you and me.

Not to the rich, but to the poor.

As pebbles in the sea.

Telling hands alone are builders.

And masonry alone is fame.

Tried hands alone are builders.

And masonry alone is fame.

Fed and fattened on the same.

By the sweat of other's forehead.

Loving only to rejoice.

While the poor man's hand is free.

Vainly lifted up his voice.

Truth and justice are eternal.

Born with love and light.

Sect wrong shall never prosper.

While there is a sunny right.

God, who counts by souls, not dresses.

Blesses love to you and me.

As pebbles in the sea.

DUELING IN NEW ORLEANS.

How a Young Kentuckian went to his Death Twenty-five Years Ago.

From the New York Times.

More than a quarter of a century ago New Orleans was the scene of a duel, the particulars of which are vividly recalled by the leading events of the recently performed tragedy.

At the date alluded to, a young man, hailing from the State of Kentucky, made his appearance in the city, who attracted attention from his remarkable personal beauty, great intelligence and winning manners.

He was tall, fair complexioned, with a bright, smiling face, set off with a profusion of golden hair. The era was one of hostility, especially for the sons of the "dark and bloody ground," and young Burt, in furtherance of his pursuit—the study of law—though without the possession of liberal means, found an anchorage in the office of one of the best lawyers, who instructed him in the mysteries of his chosen profession, with such success that, between the careful teachings of the master and the natural ability of the pupil, ere a year elapsed the young adventurer found himself not only a lawyer, but in possession of a paying practice.

His course was a continued success. Every one hailed his good fortune. He seemed to be exempt from creating the hostility of any. Flattered by society, he was the central point of the fashionable party. Acknowledged as a rising star in his profession, he was a favorite with the members of the Bar and Bench. High-spirited, ambitious, and desiring to excel in all honorable ambitions, he united himself with one of the two high spirited spirits of the day, and was soon the acknowledged leader of the young men of his adopted home.

The head and front of very high social and talent from all parts of the United States, that superior enterprise and prospects of success had at the time attracted to the "Green City." But young Burt, in all this triumph, had a source of constant uneasiness and apprehension. He was eminently a self-made man. Left an orphan in his tender years, he had been reared to the sacrifices of a devoted mother and two accomplished sisters for the means that carried him through his studies, and placed him in the position of a rising star.

This sacred history nettled him; he had no proud title of family precedence; no social distinction of reflection; no light to show in the future; no knowledge of what he did not possess, he evidently conceived the idea that in high spirited society, he must be the hero of a duel to make unquestioned the place his personal and intellectual merits were rapidly assigning him.

In short, the feud of the duello was weaving a net about his feet; the "brilliant reputation" of the great (1) duelist triumphs appear loosely lying in his grasp—the temptation of a dead possessed him.

Of all the magnificent gatherings that distinguished the St. Charles Hotel that winter, no allusion was reached the splendor achieved the night when young Burt led into the center of the hall-room the acknowledged belle of the evening. They looked with unbecoming envy upon the lovely representative of their sex; the gentlemen felt without a show of jealousy that they were not so fairly represented. The jam was overwhelming, the sets were always instantly made up, and it appeared that Burt's lovely partner for the evening, indeed, would find no place when an opening presented itself, and without apparently noticing that a lady for the most part accompanied by a young man, was intruding upon the resplendent couple, as by right of royal precedence, took possession and waited for the music to begin.

A moment more and a most quiet, unpretentious Englishman, but little known in New Orleans, and that little simply as a business man, politely signified to young Burt that he was intruding, and pointed to his lady partner as an evidence of his assertion. The feud triumphed; his noble representative of nature forgot himself, and taking from his right hand his unsold glove, he gracefully dashed it across the face of the astonished stranger; then, turning to the lady, he turned to receive the proud glances of approval shot from the eyes of his resplendent partner.
